Let Me Sleep.

The day is gone, I've walked since morn,
O'er paths as rough and steep,
That I have often weary grown,
But dared not go to sleep.

For o'er the loved ones by my side
A strict watch I would keep,
Not knowing what it might betide
If I should fall asleep.

But now the night is coming on,
Its shadows o'er me creep;
My hopes, my fears, my strength is gone,
And now, now I must sleep.

And looking back o'er duty's path,
I see no cause to weep,
And to my loved ones I would say,
Mourn not, if now I sleep.

I've pointed out for you to shun
Each pitfall, dark or deep;
Keep well my precepts, then you'll walk
With safety, though I sleep.

You need not now my sheltering form
When rough winds o'er you sweep,
So, dearly loved ones, lay me down,
And let me go to sleep.

And when above this weary heart
The earth lies cold and deep,
Pass calmly there and thank our God
For my long, quiet sleep.

On An Iceberg.

I was once summoned home from my travels on the Continent by very important news. There was no time to lose in getting back, so I went as fast as I could to Havre, and took the first ship that sailed for New York.

It was in the month of June, which I considered the most pleasant month in the year to cross the Atlantic; and though I found after leaving that my ship was an old and leaky concern, yet I did not feel any very great anxiety.

We went on for several days, and as we were favored with a fine breeze, perfectly fair, we made very rapid progress, and soon came within the region of the banks of Newfoundland.

But here a stop was put upon our progress. On the second day after we arrived on this spot the wind died away altogether.

For an entire day we lay becalmed, with the ship tossing lazily over the huge ocean surges. All hands grew impatient. Our captain, who had been in high glee at our quick progress, and had expected by this time to be sailing into New York Harbor, now lost his patience, and spent the greater part of time in cursing alternately the wind, the waves, the sky, the sun, the ship, and his own eyes.

This did not help the matter at all, however. In fact, worse things than a mere calm were in store for us. During the night a fog came on, and when we awoke in the morning it had closed in all around us with a density that I had never seen equaled.

Here was a pretty situation. A dead calm, a smooth sea, and not a breath of wind. I blamed myself a thousand times for not going on to Liverpool and taking another steamer.

However, there was no resource but patience. Patient we had to be, whether we liked it or not.

In the middle of the following day, however, we felt a slight breath of air. It was the first breath of a glorious wind which now again was blowing favorably as before. Through the day it increased, blowing stronger every hour, until, when I went to bed, I retired with a pleasing thought that every hour carried me ten miles nearer to my home.

I slept soundly. But suddenly, at about three o'clock in the morning, as far as I can recollect, I was awakened by a sudden crash which sounded like thunder to my half-awakened senses, and seemed to shake the ship to pieces.

In a moment I was out of my berth and up on the deck.

Great Heaven! what a spectacle there met my gaze!
All around was the blackness of darkness. The wind was howling fiercely through the rigging. The sailors were running wildly to and fro. The captain was standing like a man paralyzed, and shouting, while he wrung his hands, 'We're lost! we're lost!'

I spoke not a word to any one, but quickly and nimbly, as a cat, I leaped down from the quarter-deck on to the poop deck and rushed forward. It was so intensely dark and thick that I could see but little with distinctness. Yet a strange feeling of intense cold made itself evident even then to my senses.

I leaped from the forecastle.

Then a sight of horror burst upon my view.

High before me, extending out of sight, was a vast precipice—appearing in the darkness to be of immeasurable proportions. And at this the ship was crashing and pounding. At each stroke of the ship huge masses came thundering down, and falling with deafening noise into the ocean.

What was it? Was it the rocky coast of Newfoundland? or was it a lonely rock in the middle ocean?

It was neither. I soon knew all.

It was a vast iceberg!

The ice itself was not colder than the chill that rushed through every nerve as this appalling thought burst upon my mind. Then in one moment an utter sense of ruin, of hopeless desolation, took away my faculties.

But there was no time to lose, nor was there time even to mourn. For the ship, acted upon by the long rolling waves of the Atlantic, was driving with fearful violence full against the enormous mass. I heard the crashing ice—I heard the shattering of her timbers—I heard the rush of the water as it poured into her.

The ship seemed alive, struggling like some drowning wretch to avert her fate. The groaning of her parting timbers sounded like a human voice—the voice of one in agony.

A mighty wave of gigantic size now lifted the quivering mass high into the air. Retreating backward it bore its load away from the iceberg for some considerable distance, but only to hurl it back with more tremendous force.

Returning with redoubled power it flung the ship headlong against the enormous mass. I, who was standing on the prow, was thrown as though I was a straw off from the ship entirely. I fell prostrate and almost senseless upon the iceberg, on a declining surface along which I shot for a long distance, until I was stopped by an upright mass of ice.

All around me I heard a burst of fearful sound—a sound of crashing timbers, falling masts, roaring waters, crumbling masses of ice, and howling winds, while high and distinct above them all arose a shrill wail of human agony which shall never be forgotten by me, until my ear is closed to all earthly sounds forever.

'Miserable!'

Alone there in the thick darkness, clinging to the mass of ice before me, with the tempest howling 'round, and the sense of horror at the fate of my companions, it was wonderful that through the accumulated terrors of that fearful moment my mind passed without failing beneath the unequal trial.

'Miserable!'

I too exclaimed the last word of my companions, and sank senseless upon the ice.

How long I lay I know not. It could not have been less than an hour, but at last sense returned, and with it all the recollection of my situation.

I rose to my feet painfully.

I was first aware of my own physical condition. Yet before doing anything I cast a look around.

The fog had cleared away altogether.

The broad expanse of ocean lay before me, its deep blue surface reflecting the gorgeous rays of the sun which was just rising. There was not a breath of wind, and the sea was as unruffled as a mountain lake.

I cast a glance downward to see if there was a single vestige of the ill-fated ship.

Alas! not a single vestige could be seen. Not a plank—not even a chip floating upon the water. I only—I only had escaped to tell the tale.

I was standing upon a broad surface of ice nearly half an acre in extent. It was smooth and slippery as glass.

It was nearly level. I was at the lower end of it, and had been stopped by a high wall against which I had stuck.

mother, who had been Fanny Orchard before her marriage, and venerated both her father and his watch. 'But we can't whip the boy.'

'No,' said Pa. 'Some other means must be devised.'

'Shut him in a closet,' said grandpa. 'Oh!' cried ma. Then acquiescing—'I suppose it must be done, poor child.'

Now a sound whipping would have done the child good. But Tom was a superstitious child, and dreaded the dark most wofully. The ghost he had always expected to see come to him probably in that murky closet, for at the end of an hour he was taken out in a fit, caused by his terror. It was a terrible time for that little household. Tom was put to bed and a doctor sent for.

Grandfather Orchard shut himself up in his room and wept, and his daughter almost hated him. For his sake she had punished Tom, and this was the end.

Alas! worse was to come. The little head never lifted from the pillow. It was certain to have happened some time, the doctor said. The child could not have lived to grow up, he was dying.

In a week he was dead, and the mother and father in their self-reproach heaped double reproaches on the old man, who bore them all in silence.

All the reproaches were of no avail, however. The little creature lay in his coffin, and Grandfather Orchard was to leave his daughter's home on the day after the funeral.

It was midnight. The mother sat alone in the room, with her head child. It was not very light and the curtains of the window dropped over her. To one entering, the room would have seemed empty. Some one did enter, on tip-toe. The weeping woman did look. It was her father. His face was wet with tears. In his hand he carried something, glittering in the feeble rays of the lamp on the mantle.

He bent over the coffin.

'Grandpa's Tommy!' he moaned, with his feeble old voice. 'Oh, my pretty child! My pretty, murdered child! I'll be the next—I'll be the next, I hope! But I never thought to see this sight!'

Then he seemed to move the little form—to be busy about it, somehow. The mother stepped forward, and looked, unseen.

The old man had lifted up the head of the dead child, and beneath the little lace-trimmed pillow was hiding away his watch. The watch now in order again, as before the child's fingers had been busy with it. The only thing of value the poor old man possessed.

The mother saw, and was softened. She came closer to the old man, and called him by his familiar name:

'Father—dear father!'

Then she laid upon his breast, weeping, and the two were reconciled.

But she made no effort to prevent the accomplishment of the old man's wish, and the watch, which had been the cause of the child's death, if any earthly thing were actually the cause of it, was buried with him.

A Very Small Boy's Composition—Subject, "Girls."

I don't like girls. Girls is different from what boys is. Girls don't play marbles, and also don't play hooky.

I played hooky once, and got whipped for it. Girls sometimes gets whipped, but not so much as boys; their clothes ain't so well suited for it; that is the reason, I suppose. I never sees girls play base ball, but they say they do in Boston. There is plenty of girls in Boston and big organs' Last year, when I was young, the teacher made me set with the girls because I was naughty. I cried. Big boys like girls better than little boys.

I went on a sleighride one night, with sister Nancy and Tom Sykes. We were going to New Hartford, and when we got up by Pegg's tavern, Tom asked me to look in the bottom of the sleigh for his whip; while I was looking he fired off a torpedo. I asked him if he had any more torpedoes, and he said no, but he fired off another when I wasn't looking. Girls don't like to have men kiss them; they always say 'don't.' If they wasn't fools they would turn their heads the other way, but they never do that. I saw Tom kiss Nancy once, and I went and
